"Several of my friends, who were their families' breadwinners, were killed by the police and military forces.... The people of this region have no other option of employment. They are taking risks with their lives in order to feed their families." — a kulbar from Baneh, in an interview with the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran

DANGEROUS BORDERS, CALLOUS MURDERS

In 2006, Iranian authorities began implementing a new border security program intended to prevent terrorists and smuggled goods from crossing its borders. In the months between March 2011 and April 2012, at least 74 low-income Iranian citizens working as cross-border couriers were killed in the border regions, and at least another 76 were injured, largely by security forces. These killings and injuries, featured in a full list below, all occurred between March 2011 and April 2012 within the context of Iran's Border Closure Plan.¹

The numerous cases of border security forces killing couriers, often called kulbar, in the northwestern provinces of West Azerbaijan, Kurdistan, and Kermanshah represent a growing pattern of excessive use of lethal force. The sudden increase in border killings and injuries appears to be an outcome of Iran's "comprehensive project of sustainable security," as Deputy Interior Minister for Security Affairs Ali Abdollahi called the Border Closure Plan.²

"Iranian law regards the activities of the kulbari as a crime that is punishable by several months of detention or a fine equal to the value of the seized commodities," explains a March 2012 report by UN Special Rapporteur on human rights in Iran Ahmed Shaheed. "[H]owever ... Iranian border guards [reportedly] indiscriminately shoot at these individuals, thereby killing and wounding dozens of kulbari annually, as well as their horses."

This briefing paper features a growing list of victims of border security violence and exposure to the inhospitable conditions of the less-patrolled areas of Iran's southwestern, northwestern, and western borders, which PressTV reported as "the Interior Ministry's priorities."³

BACKGROUND

The Campaign has documented 74 deaths and 76 injuries to individuals working as kulbar, couriers that carry illegally imported goods, such as tobacco, electronics, and tires, on their backs, and kasebkar, tradesmen who transport similar goods into larger towns. These individuals live and work in the predominantly Kurdish northwestern border provinces of Iran's West Azerbaijan, Kurdistan, and Kermanshah.

Of the 74 deceased kulbar and kasebkar, 70 were allegedly shot and killed by government border forces, and four reportedly died as a result of landmine explosions, avalanches, and exposure to severe cold. Among the 76 injured, eight were hurt during landmine explosions, and the rest by border security. These numbers only represent individuals whose identities and case particulars the Campaign was able to verify independently or through reliable local sources. There may be many more cases; however, due to the economic and geographic isolation of the kulbar these cases are likely underreported.

The Economic Landscape of Kulbar and Kasebkar

Iran has 8,755 kilometers of shared borders with 15 countries, 2,000 kilometers through sea borders. With more than 240 kilometers of land and water borders, Iraq is Iran's major western neighbor. Due to Iraq's internal issues and lack of security in the country, Iran's western borders are considered one of the major points of entry and exit of smuggled goods and fuel. West Azerbaijan Province has 960 kilometers of shared borders with Iraq, Turkey, and the Republic of Azerbaijan.

The kulbar and kasebkar are mostly active in the mountainous border region between the towns of Qasr-e Shirin and Khoy in Iran, along its northwestern borders with Iraq and Turkey.⁴ This geography spans the provinces of Kermanshah, Kurdistan, and West Azerbaijan.

This region is predominantly populated by Kurds, an ethnic minority in Iran, and is marked by a general dearth of economic infrastructure and development proportionate to the population, resulting in high rates of poverty and unemployment. The Iranian government puts the unemployment rate for the region at 14 percent, but local experts and activists say this number is a misrepresentation and the real rate is well over 20 percent.⁵

⁴ International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran interview with local expert on kulbar and kasebkar, April 2012.

⁵ Doniya-y-e Eghtesad as quotes by Farda News, “Unemployment rents in the double digits in 23 provinces,” (Narkh-e bikaari-ye do raghami dar 23 ostan), Farda News, April 16, 2012, <http://www.fardanews.com/fa/news/197599/%D9%86%D8%B1%D8%AE-%D8%A8%D8%8C%DA%A9%D8%A7%D8%B1%D8%8C-%D8%AF%D9%88%D8%B1%D9%82%D9%>

The provinces of Kermanshah, Kurdistan, and parts of West Azarbaijan are predominantly populated by Kurds, an ethnic minority in Iran. The border towns are marked by a general dearth of economic infrastructure and development proportionate to the population, resulting in high rates of unemployment.

Due to the high rate of unemployment, many locals engage in transporting and importing foreign goods through unofficial channels in return for a small fee. These kulbar carry packages on their backs or on horses through hard-to-reach mountain passes over borders and into the region's towns and villages. Individuals who transport goods by car into larger towns and the country's central region are called kasebkar or tradesmen. Kasebkar typically employ kulbar.

"Goods transported by kulbar and border tradesmen into the country mostly include audio and video equipment, clothing and fabric, makeup, car tires, cigarettes, and, in a very limited way, alcohol," a local expert familiar with the subject and with those regions where encounters between the kulbar and security forces frequently occur told the Campaign.

Massoud Kordpour, a Sanandaj-based journalist and activist, told Deutsche Welle news agency in an interview in April 2011: "You see all the individuals who are kulbar and who die for this. This phenomenon of working as a kulbar shows that the economic situation of the region is so bad that people are forced to take on a job that has a security component and carries the danger of death and being shot."⁶

Iran's Border Closure Plan

According to Campaign research based on statements and observations by local activists, kulbar and kasebkar are known to use border regions as far south as Nosood in Kermanshah Province and as far north as Salmas in West Azarbaijan Province.

The border region near the town of Sardasht, in West Azerbaijan, has seen the most alleged killings of border couriers and tradesmen by the Iranian police, followed by the Marivan and Baneh border regions in Kurdistan.

The Border Closure Plan affects all of the regions where kulbar and kasebkar live. State media do not cover the killings of kulbar and kasebkar, leading to a lack of public information and therefore no public discussion about the human cost of the plan.

The Establishment of the Plan

A local human rights activist told the Campaign that the recent surge in killings of kulbar coincided with the beginning of Iran's Border Closure Plan in 2006. That year, a large budget was approved for the implementation of several projects in several border areas in the country, most notably West Azerbaijan Province, and projects continued in Kurdistan Province and areas of Kermanshah Province into 2008.⁷ The plan aimed to combat goods smuggling and illegal traffic across the borders, and a crackdown on border couriers, known as kulbar, and border tradesmen, known as kasebkar, has intensified since that time.

Various Iranian officials have claimed that the plan has contributed to a decline in border smuggling, but there is no evidence to back up such claims. Unfortunately, after this plan was implemented, the statistics of border couriers and tradesmen who were killed rose considerably.

During a visit to the border areas of Kurdistan Province in December 2008, Ahmad Reza Radan, Deputy Commander of Iran's Police, told reporters at a press conference, "The ultimate goal of the Border Closure Plan, which aims to combat smuggling and illegal trade, is the country's economic growth and development.... According to this plan, problem border areas, whether by land or water, will be completely closed by erecting monitoring towers, digging canals, setting up barbed wire, building walls, [and] using electronic equipment and thermal cameras, in order to prevent smuggling and to cut off the reach of smugglers and gold diggers through illegitimate means."⁸

On December 18, 2009, Alireza Sheikh Robat, Khuzestan Province's Deputy Governor for Security and Police Affairs, told Fars News Agency, "During recent months, the High Council on National Security has asked the Interior Ministry to prepare a comprehensive project on border management in the country. This plan will organize the borders in all dimensions, including border closure, legal issues, livelihood, and welfare of border region residents and organization of border ports."⁹

Plan Budget

Since its inception, hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on the Border Closure Plan, though no government official has so far announced the total funds allocated to the project. "This year, $106 million will be spent on the country's Border Closure Plan," said the Interior Minister, Mostafa Najjar, during a press conference in 2010.¹⁰ In a public appeal to the Iranian Parliament to request more funding for the Border Closure Plan on December 16, 2011, Police Commander Esmaeel Ahmadi Moghaddam complained about the inadequacy of the 2011 budget, saying, "The figure of $85,000 for the Border Closure Plan is a small figure; it has been reduced compared to the project's initial year budget of $125 [thousand]."¹¹ However, just a few days later, on January 19, 2012, Ali Abdollahi, the Security-Police Deputy for Iran's Interior Ministry told Ettela'at Newspaper that since 2007, the budget allocated to the Border Closure Plan had increased. "The development work on the borders has increased 1,200%, and the related budget has also grown 17 times, but these resources are still insufficient," he said.¹² borders as mountain borders, field borders, and water borders. “The closure of borders has taken place according to geographical conditions. In some areas, in order to close the borders we had to erect cement walls, in some areas barbed wire, in some canals, as well as establishing police stations and monitoring towers,” he said. “Of course, establishing border police stations in western Iran is a priority for the Interior Ministry, as so many police stations in this area were destroyed during the Iran-Iraq War,” he emphasized.¹³

Officials discuss two main objectives for the Border Closure Plan: protecting Iran against terrorists and staunching the flow of smuggled goods in and out of the country. While most of the border activity involves transportation of goods, Iranian officials use the language of terrorism to justify heavily arming the border patrol.

Regarding Iran’s western borders, Police Commander Moghaddam stated at a press conference on April 26, 2011, “The Hypocrites [i.e., the Mojahedin-e Khalgh Organization, the MEK] did not have border activities in Iran’s western borders because the Iraqi government prevented their efforts through border control. The PJAK grouplet has been active in the western and northwestern areas, which have naturally been monitored by the IRGC forces who are responsible for the border security in this region, and there have been effective efforts to confront this grouplet.”¹⁴

On the economic side, in May 2009 Commander Hossein Sajedinia told Mehr News that there had been an 80% drop in the amount of goods smuggled through Iran’s western borders through the country’s Border Closure Plan. “So far, with the allocation of $1.03 million, we have been able to dig 350 kilometers of 4-meter deep and 8-meter wide canals, 114 kilometers of walls, and 800 kilometers of barbed wire for closing the country’s borders,” he said.¹⁵

Police Commander Moghaddam described the economic aspect of the Border Closure Plan at the same April 2011 press conference:

“By enforcing these plans, we minimize and close traffic from the other side of land borders, where it is possible for cars and livestock to enter, and we have been pretty successful in this area.... This year we will put in more effort to realize the goal of supporting goods manufactured in Iran while reducing smuggled foreign goods.... This year, $100 million of the Police Force’s defense budget has been allocated for equipping the border patrol, and $103 million has been allocated from the government budget for completing the border closure operations.”¹⁶

Economic Consequences for Residents

At its inception, together with preventing goods smuggling, the Border Closure Plan promised job creation and assistance for the livelihood of border region residents. None of those promises, however, have materialized for the residents.

While officials held up the Border Closing Plan as a program to stimulate economic growth within Iran, the regions along Iran's western border remain among the most economically depressed in the country.¹⁷ Without any other opportunities to earn money and feed their families, many of the people in these regions are resorting to border smuggling even as it becomes ever more dangerous.

In December 2008, Fakhreddin Heydari, an Iranian Parliament Member representing Kurdistan Province's Saghez and Baneh towns, demanded a comprehensive approach to the Border Closure Plan which would augment the plan with a job creation scheme that would include constructing border shopping malls, easing imports and exports, and encouraging financial investment in the region. "People's participation would guarantee the success of every plan, especially in social and economic areas, on the condition that the plan's objectives would not be in contradiction with the society's legitimate goals," Heydari told the reporters.¹⁸

Even with government statistics that many believe consistently paint a more favorable picture of Iran's economy, with 2011's high unemployment rates of Ilam and Kermanshah at 15.7%, Kurdistan at 14%, and Western Azerbaijan at 13%, Iran's western provinces are among those with highest unemployment rates in the country.¹⁹

the government's economic and banking policies, not only did the smuggling statistics not decrease, but there was even a serious jump in the value of goods smuggled into Iran over the past year.²¹

Contrary to official claims, the Border Closure Plan and related government policies that are not designed to facilitate legal gainful employment for border residents have pushed border region residents to work as kulbar and kasebkar as the only means to earn a living in a depressed economy.

Residents of Iran's western provinces told the Campaign that the increased risk of death or injury has not contributed to a decrease in goods smuggling, but has simply made the trade more dangerous for them. They said that because the economic conditions in their region are so poor, they have no other option than to work as kulbar or kasebkar.

CASES

The Campaign has documented 74 deaths and 76 injuries to individuals working as kulbar, couriers that carry illegally imported goods, such as tobacco, electronics, and tires, on their backs, and kasebkar, tradesmen who transport similar goods into larger towns. These killings and injuries, featured in a full list below, all occurred between March 2011 and April 2012 within the context of a new government border control program.

"These kulbar are unarmed—if they were armed it would aggravate any charges they might face," a local expert on the kulbar told the Campaign.²²

Of the 74 deceased kulbar and kasebkar, 70 were allegedly shot and killed by government border forces, and four reportedly died as a result of landmine explosions, avalanches, and exposure to severe cold. Among the 76 injured, eight were hurt during landmine explosions, and the rest by border security. These numbers only represent individuals whose identities and case particulars the Campaign was able to verify independently or through reliable local sources. There may be many more cases; however, due to the economic and geographic isolation of the kulbar these cases are likely under-reported.

The local expert told the Campaign that, in practice, fines can be several times the value of the seized goods. "If they encounter the authorities, they simply try to run away to avoid what would be a hefty fine. Because they usually cannot afford such an amount, they would be thrown in prison," the expert added.²³ border town of Baneh told the Campaign,

Because of the border closing project, during the past several years, without regard for our lives, the police have been waiting in mountainous and hard-to-pass areas for us. After warning us to stop, without firing a warning shot, they shoot at us directly.... Several times during these past few years, bullets have flown by the side of my head and hands....

Kulbar carry goods such as cigarettes, textiles, and video equipment. Even if we were to escape, we would not cause heavy damage to the government, warranting their wanton direct targeting of us....

Several of my friends, who were their families' breadwinners, were killed by the police and military forces.... The people of this region have no other option of employment. They are taking risks with their lives in order to feed their families.²⁴

Another local source told the Campaign,

As an example, on 22 March 2011, during confiscation of goods from several border tradesmen in the town of Nosood, the Deputy Border Commander of Nosood shot at several kulbar inside the town's ²⁴ International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran interview with kulbar from Baneh, April 2012.

Moallem Square. A young Kurdish man by the name of Pourmand Madhatnia was murdered during the shooting and three other citizens were injured.²⁵

The killing of Madhatnia triggered protests by locals of the town. The police initially detained the officer involved in the shooting, then transferred him to a post in another town. Later, however, the police attacked and arrested several of those who had participated in the protest, the source said.

In an earlier example of excessive force, in February 2010, police severely beat Mohammad Reza Khalidi, a 60-year-old Kurdish-Iranian bulldozer operator in the border region of Chalehcheremi in Nosood, leading to his death. Authorities had mistakenly thought Khalidi was a kulbar.²⁶

A close friend of Khalidi told the Campaign, “After his family filed a lawsuit with the military court, the police denied the incident, even though several locals testified to it, and after several months, under pressure from the police, the case was shelved.”²⁷

Not all arrests lead to legal limbo. According to a local source quoting a family member of Hashem Nazari, a kulbar from Javanrood who was arrested for “carrying smuggled goods” on November 26, 2010, Nazari died a suspicious death inside the Nahavand-Kangavar road police station detention center. After his arrest, Hashem Nazari was sentenced to cash fines by the Kangavar Governmental Discretionary Punishments Organization, and was to be transferred to Kermanshah Central Prison. However, before being transferred to prison, he died inside the police detention center.²⁸ his cause of death as “suicide.” His family’s demands for an investigation into his cause of death have been futile. Police authorities have stated that they performed an autopsy on his body and sent the results to Tehran to determine of the cause of death, but as of this writing, the family has not received any responses.

Another example of excessive use of force is the murder of Kamyaran kulbar Bakhtiar Rahmani. During a pursuit of several automobiles carrying foreign cigarettes, forces from Kermanshah’s Anti-Smuggling Office directly shot and killed the driver of one of the cars. After the Kurdish man’s murder, the Anti-Smuggling officers were unable to find any goods in the tradesman’s automobile. Furthermore, after returning Bakhtiar Rahmani’s body to his family, they pressured his family to introduce Rahmani’s friends to the police.

In addition to the deaths and injuries sustained by kulbar themselves, some kulbar and their families and friends have reported that border security have intentionally shot and killed their horses and other beasts of burden used to transport goods. Sources in the towns of Marivan and Sardasht also claim that police have set fire to several animals carrying smuggled fuel into Iraqi Kurdistan, burning them alive.

According to sources, police kill the animals to increase the cost of the trade for couriers, tradesmen, and their families, aiming to deter this type of work in the border areas.

Lack of Redress and Accountability

Due to the levels of extreme violence facing kulbar and kasebkar, many live in fear of attacks that could maim or kill them. However, due to the general poverty and lack of education in the regions where kulbar and kasebkar reside, many never file complaints for fear of fines or imprisonment, or worse. A local activist familiar with the situation told the Campaign that even those who do file cases will rarely follow up with the courts, out of the same fears.²⁹

The Campaign investigated the cases of dozens of injured kulbar and the families of killed kulbar who filed complaints with the Iranian Judiciary. In some cases the Judiciary effectively quashed hearings by postponing them indefinitely. In other cases, according to the families, authorities never even responded to their complaints. In one case authorities paid the complaining family diyeh or blood money, which is the financial compensation provided in cases of murder.

Two Kurdish kulbar, who were paralyzed in their arms and legs during separate incidents of direct shootings by the police, filed lawsuits against the police in military courts. Their family members told the Campaign that their lawsuits have not been addressed, despite testimonies by several eyewitnesses and reports from the medical examiner. One of the kulbar was from the Nosood border region in Kermanshah Province, and the other from the Rash Mountain border in the town of Salmas in West Azerbaijan Province.³⁰

Another obstacle the kulbar face is lack of access to legal representation and the courts. The family of the paralyzed kulbar from Nosood told the Campaign he could not afford a lawyer. After several years of pursuing a lawsuit in military court and repeated postponements by the court, his case has in effect been abandoned since the court has not reacted to his lawsuit. The other paralyzed kulbar, from Salmas, does have a lawyer, his family told the Campaign. Nevertheless, the military court judge, who is presiding over the case in Tehran, has postponed his court sessions every month for several years, despite his vigorous pursuit of the case, the family said.³¹

INTERNATIONAL CONCERNS AND LAW

The killings of and severe injuries to the kulbar violate Iran's obligations under both domestic and international law. Attacking the kulbar, who are from some of the poorest areas of Iran, is using lethal force—without charges or trials—against people relegated to this activity by their economic circumstances. Furthermore, killing the animals they use for their trade amounts to imposing a punishment without due process.

In his March 2012 report, UN Special Rapporteur on human rights in Iran Ahmed Shaheed raises concerns over the reported “systematic killings of kulbars (back carriers) and kasebkaran (tradesmen), Kurds residing in border areas. The kulbaran, who ferry cargo across the border on their backs or smuggle commodities such as tea, tobacco and fuel to earn a living, are particularly affected.”³²

Furthermore, Shaheed describes the discrepancies between the criminal punishments Iranian law describes for the kulbar and the fate that awaits them in practice. “Iranian law regards the activities of the kulbari as a crime that is punishable by several months of detention or a fine equal to the value of the seized commodities. [H]owever ... Iranian border guards [reportedly] indiscriminately shoot at these individuals, thereby killing and wounding dozens of kulbari annually, as well as their horses.”³³

International law grants states the authority to control their borders, including imports and exports to and from their country. Nonetheless, international law does put limitations on law enforcement.³⁴

These killings violate the right to life enshrined in article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Iran is a state party.

The UN Human Rights Committee, in general comment 6 on the right to life, considered “that States parties should take measures ... to prevent arbitrary killing by their own security forces. The deprivation of life by the authorities of the State is a matter of the utmost gravity. Therefore, the law must strictly control and limit the circumstances in which a person may be deprived of his life by such authorities.”³⁵

In October 2011, Christof Heyns, UN Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, explained, “[L]ethal force should not be used unless there is a reasonable suspicion that the suspect has committed a crime involving serious violence, or has threatened to do so, [but] that is not enough. For deadly force to be used by the police, there must be an immediate or ongoing threat to the public if the person were to escape.”³⁶

 RECOMMENDATIONSTo the Government of Iran:

- Put an end to the use of lethal force against unarmed kulbar and kasebkar.
- Uphold promises to enhance the economic situation of the residents of border regions.
- Adopt policies respecting economic and social rights and create conditions favorable to legal employment at livable wages in the border regions.
- Clear the landmines in border regions.
- Stop harassing local human rights activists who shed light on abuses committed by border security.

To the Iranian Judiciary:

- Investigate those killings that have occurred and hold perpetrators accountable.
- Stop using illegal methods to intimidate and silence victims and their families.
- Stop harassing the families of those who seek accountability and justice.

To the Iranian Police:

- Train border security officials to respect domestic and international law, human dignity, and life.
- Adopt clear policies to stop unlawful and unnecessary killing.

To the Iranian Parliament:

- Review border security measures and the growing pattern of border security forces killing kulbar and kasebkar without cause.
- Craft legislation to stop unlawful and unnecessary killing.
- Develop the budget of the Border Closure Plan to ensure economic improvement in the region.

To the International Community:

- Monitor the situation of kulbar, kasebkar, and residents of Iran's border regions.
- Hold the Iranian government accountable for these human rights violations.
- Take appropriate action to encourage the Iranian government to ensure the economic and social rights of border residents.

Dangerous Borders, Callous Murders

Documenting the Killings of Couriers in Iran's Western Provinces

Iranian law regards the activities of the kulbari as a crime that is punishable by several months of detention or a fine equal to the value of the seized commodities. [H]owever ... Iranian border guards [reportedly] indiscriminately shoot at these individuals, thereby killing and wounding dozens of kulbari annually, as well as their horses.

—Ahmed Shaheed, UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Islamic Republic of Iran

In 2006, Iranian authorities began implementing a new border security program intended to prevent terrorists and smuggled goods from crossing its borders. In the months between March 2011 and April 2012, at least 74 low-income Iranian citizens working as cross-border couriers were killed in the border regions, and at least another 76 were injured, largely by security forces. These killings and injuries, featured in a full list herein, all occurred between March 2011 and April 2012 within the context of Iran's Border Closure Plan.

The numerous cases of border security forces killing couriers, often called kulbar, in the northwestern provinces of West Azerbaijan, Kurdistan, and Kermanshah represent a growing pattern of excessive use of lethal force. The sudden increase in border killings and injuries appears to be an outcome of Iran's "comprehensive project of sustainable security," as Deputy Interior Minister for Security Affairs Ali Abdollahi called the border-closing project.

This briefing paper features a growing list of victims of border security violence and exposure to the inhospitable conditions of the less-patrolled areas of Iran's southwestern, northwestern, and western borders, which PressTV reported as "the Interior Ministry's priorities."
